The 1964 Summer Olympics had no shortage of unusual participants. One of the most curious - and controversial - in the group that competed in the Tae Kwon Do tournament on the first day of the Olympics was a little, black girl named T.S. But a word that some might use to describe her was not very nice: "Yokohama" - a slur to describe Japanese people who were perceived to be contemptuous of Western culture. "We're just Chinese and Japanese," T.S. replied to questions about her background. T.S. became the first black American in the Olympics, and a personification of the Olympics and of multiculturalism. The 1964 Olympics were the culmination of a four-year journey for T.S. That journey began when her father heard about an unusual competition at the World Tae Kwon Do Championships. The international tournament was held in Taiwan at the end of 1963. T.S.'s father was in Japan working in the U.S. Embassy, and he suggested that she try it. "My dad said, 'It's a tournament, you can learn it and do the best you can,'" T.S. recalled. She was still in elementary school, and remembered it was the last day of the tournament. With a little more time on her hands, she decided to go to one of the arenas where the first day of the 1964 Olympics was taking place. "My mother was there, my father, my brother, so I just went," she said. When T.S. and her family came into the arena, her mother - a Japanese citizen - was turned back at the gate. Her father's passport also proved to be useless. So T.S. joined the queue for the press box, where there were a lot of people and they were all very friendly. "When the time came, I got to sit down in the press box," she said. "And they were, I don't know, just talking. And they said, 'Oh, do you know who that is?' And they pointed to this little black girl." The most popular movie at the time was the musical "Shall We Dance?" starring Shirley Temple, and they discussed the possibility of going to a show, according to T.S. "And I said, 'Oh, no, I
